

Two persons are now in confinement, charged with being concerned in the late attempt to rob the Bank of Mr. Redmond, at Wexford. One of those persons was so minutely described by the woman-servant whom the robbers bound on first entering the Bank House, that a brother of Mr. Redmond in passing along Dame-street lately, was struck with the exact application of the description to a person whom he accidentally encountered. He resolved at once to put the suspicions thus raised in his mind to proof, if possible, and, with this intention, followed the man at a distance. The suspected person turned up a narrow passage leading from Dame court into Dame-street, where he stopped, and took a letter from his pocket, which he had appeared to have received a very little time, and which he read with great agitation. Mr. Redmond took the opportunity of approaching him, and glancing his eyes towards the letter, he recognized it to be the hand writing of a person in Wexford, upon which he immediately seized the man, and brought him to the Head Office of Police, where he underwent an immediate and scrutinizing examination. He told some very inconsistent things of himself, which the sagacity of his examiners soon detected, and he was so unsuccessful in all his attempts to evade the rigour of the investigation he had to undergo, that he was committed to trial without a question upon the propriety of the accusation. The letter from Wexford contained a bank-note, as it would seem to enable the person to quit Ireland. It was written in a mysterious manner, with the allusions it contained being written with studied obscurity, and evidently to be understood only by a person familiar with the subject upon which it was written. The allusions to the attempt at the robbery of the Bank were not so dexterously made as to impose on the public Magistrates—they readily interpreted the tenor of the letter, the writer of which has been since lodged in Wexford Jail. The woman-servant at the Bank House, peremptorily identified the person seized in this City by Mr. Redmond, since his committal to prison.
